

Some Railroad Men Lament Passing of Western Union Clock

As railroad travelers will have to get along without the Western Union stand in Union Station, so will railroad men have to get along without the clock that's kept accurate time there for the past dozen years.

The clock was removed yesterday, and one railroad man lamented its passing. He said it was an infallible source of checking one's own watch, and although there are two other clocks in the station, he indicated they aren't quite so dependable as Western Union's was.

The clock was removed because it was part of the Western Union railroad station branch, which was discontinued recently. The clock was leased from a New York firm.
